

An Uncommon Love (Regency Historical Erotic Romance)

Maggie Webb was a dark hair beauty on the verge of a new century where she felt that women could make their own way in the world without husbands. After her soon to be husband disappeared before their wedding, she thought she might have finally convinced her father that she had no need for a husband. When her missing betrothed reappears with plans to force her to marry, he is quickly dispatched by her former suitor, the handsome Oliver Black. Now, she and Oliver find themselves falling in love again, but will their dark secret keep them from their happy ending?

Excerpt: I told you that I intended to make a proper visit soon. I am here to ask your fathers permission to sit with you on the porch for a while, he said. Then you had better run fast to catch up with him, Oliver. My father and mother just left for Surrey and will not be back for quite some time, she said. Oliver looked uncertain of what to do with himself next. Maggie found it somewhat amusing, since she had always known him to be so certain of himself when they were younger. She waited for him to speak again. Well, that being the case, I suppose that I should be leaving then. I will wait for your fathers return, he said, sounding dejected. Maggie reached out and grabbed his arm, yanking him gently into the house. Get in her, you silly man, she chided. Oliver looked surprised as he found himself tumbling over the threshold. Maggie closed the door behind him and turned toward him. She realized that he had been hiding something behind his hat. He pulled a small bunch of handpicked wildflowers and extended them toward her. These are for you, Maggie, he said. They were the saddest collection of little flowers that anyone had ever given Maggie, but she accepted them and smiled broadly at him. Thank you, Oliver. They are beautiful. Have a seat and let me put these in some water, she said, waving in the direction of the parlor. She and Oliver spend the afternoon talking about everything but what had happened with Solomon Tyler. He told her about his travels to America and how he had tried to start anew with a little farm there, but many of the farms were failing and his was no exception. He had ended up doing carpentry work for some of the wealthier locals and it paid quite well. He had only returned home to London to tidy up some affairs and then planned to return to the new world. Maggie was surprised to hear this and found that she was disheartened at the thought of him leaving again. Then why was he here, trying to court her? What was the point if her were only going to leave again? Maggie, you would love America. You could have your own school and teach. You could be free of the narrow minded views held here in London. I was hoping that if I could convince you to somehow love me, you might go there with me when I return. I know that is unreasonable. I ran away from the fact that you didnt love me before, but Ive never forgotten you. I just need to know that we have no chance before I can give up on us and move on with my life, he said.
