STOCKHOLM--DROTTNINGHOLM--UPSALA. Nothing will surprise the traveller by the Gotha Canal to the capital of Sweden more than the vastness of the cuttings through solid rock, which frequently meet his eye. The difficulties to overcome must have been enormous before the present excellence of this route could have been obtained. There must have been Swedish monarchs at work here, with as strong wills as that of the Eastern Canute, Mehemet Ali, utterly repudiating the word impossible. In the foundation and eventual extension of the Gotha Canal, Counts Pollen and Platten I believe, are the two distinguished names. The mandate of the above Pasha in Egypt was, indeed, no idle word; and if it acted like an incantation to the old Egyptian spirit of great works in the land of the Nile, it seems to have had a similar effect in Canutes own land of the North. The difference of level between the canal at Trolhattan and where it joins the river below the Falls, is 112 feet. Beyond Trolhattan the river seems to expand into a lake, and numerous islands begin to denote a change of scenery. Late in the evening we were lying at the village of Wenersburg, on the magnificent Wennersee, or Wennern Lake, said to be the largest in Europe next to that of Ladoga, in Russia. Leaving Wenersburg in the middle of the night, we passed Bromo Island early in the morning. Rising at our Indian hour, before five,--the Swedish damsels of the Stockholm preparing coffee with all possible speed,--I could find nothing particular to remark about this island. There is the lighthouse, and the wooden houses with red tiles, and the windmills retiring in the dark forest scenery, and the want of man, woman, or beast in the landscape--all so peculiar to Sweden. We kept passing numerous little gems of island...
